New insights about Indigenous employment in Canada

Research / Culture

The Canadian Council for Aboriginal Business (CCAB) and Indspire have launched a joint report exploring how Indigenous post-secondary experiences are associated with entrepreneurship, working for Indigenous employers, and overall labour market outcomes. This report, supported by the Ontario Ministry of Indigenous Affairs, marks the second step in leveraging CCAB and Indspire's collective data to better understand post-graduation socio-economic outcomes for Indigenous youth and their communities in Canada, forging a strong, collaborative research partnership that has begun to reveal key insights about these outcomes.

Using data from Indspire's 2020 National Education Survey (NES) of Building Brighter Futures: Bursaries, Scholarships, and Awards (BBF) recipients, as well as Statistics Canada's Census of Population (2016), the study yields some surprising and positive insights. For example, BBF recipients who work for Indigenous employers in Ontario report being more satisfied with their current employment than those working with non-Indigenous employers. On average, they more strongly agree that they feel valued at work, are satisfied with their current employment, that they work the desired number of hours, and that their workplace encourages a healthy work-life balance.

"This report begins to address the lack of data on Indigenous entrepreneurship and educational success", says Roberta Jamieson, President and CEO of Indspire. "Through leveraging our data and respective mandates, we can continue to produce new proprietary research aimed at shaping the actions of businesses, organizations, and governments in Canada to better support the educational success, and ultimately, the economic and social wellbeing of Indigenous peoples."

“Indigenous youth are the fastest growing demographic in Canada and a key part of Canada’s current and future workforce,” said Tabatha Bull, President and CEO, Canadian Council for Aboriginal Business. “This report is a first step in the conversation about how to attract, retain, and support this important demographic in all Canadian workplaces.”

Other key findings of the report include:

- x Approximately 35% of BBF recipients report working for an Indigenous employer.
- x A full three-quarters (75%) of BBF recipients employed by an Indigenous employer find suitable work in an Indigenous community. BBF recipients are more likely to be self-employed than Indigenous workers in the same age cohort.
- x Self-employed BBF recipients are more concentrated in the health care and social assistance, educational services, construction, and real estate rental and leasing sectors than in the broader Indigenous population.

Statistics Canada is hiring across the country

Public Administration / Professional Services

Statistics Canada is hiring for 72 administrative assistant positions for next year's census with work happening between October 2020 and August 2021.

The salary is between $47,729 and $51,518. With these jobs, you would be working exclusively from home and not in an actual workplace like an office building. However, you do have to live within an 80-kilometre radius of the areas that Statistics Canada is looking to hire from.

When it comes to requirements, there aren't actually that many needed for you to be considered. You need to have completed two years of secondary school or have an acceptable combination of education, training and/or experience.

Also, you need to have experience with general administrative support in an office and basic computer functions. That means operating a mouse, using a keyboard, opening and closing and finding software programs and files. At a later date, your ability to communicate in writing, work in a team, adapt to changing priorities and respect deadlines will be looked at.

Applications for these positions close on October 31 at 12:59 p.m. PT.

Fascinating Facts

Home prices across Canada could tumble about seven per cent in 2021, as unemployment dampens the hot real estate market. There is a "dangerous" oversupply of new, single-family homes in Calgary and Edmonton, on top of affordability issues in Vancouver and Toronto. The 2021 home price index also calls for a 6.7 per cent decrease for single-family homes and a 6.5 per cent decline in condo apartments.
